Redacting Sensitive But Not Privileged Information: Surveying the Cases For and Against – PART ONE

August 6, 2018

Written by Peter Jacobus and James J. Hefferan, Jr.

In an era of massive spreadsheets, expansive power points, and wide ranging email discussions, there are innumerable documents that may contain tremendous amounts of non-relevant and sensitive information which the opposing side would not be entitled to at all, except for that information's proximity to minimal amounts of relevant information. Not all courts have come out in the same place on redacting non-responsive information, however, and there appears to be a dearth of controlling law or general consensus. In this article we will survey a cross section of relevant cases on both sides of the issue.
