

Insights: Alerts

The FTC Expands its Negative Option Rule to Reach Autorennewal and Other Programs

October 18, 2024

Written by Michele Floyd, X. Diego Wu Min

For companies who offer recurring subscriptions, it is important for them to understand the Federal Trade Commission's recently finalized rule applicable to negative option marketing that requires such companies to make the cancellation process as easy as the enrollment process.

Negative option marketing is a sales technique where a consumer's silence or failure to take affirmative action is interpreted as acceptance of an offer. Negative option plans typically fall into one of four categories; prenotification plans, continuity plans, automatic renewal plans and free trial to paid product conversion plans. The FTC's 1973 Negative Option Rule (16 C.F.R. part 425) applied only to prenotification plans, or plans where the seller provides periodic notices offering goods to participating consumers and then sends and charges for those goods if the consumer takes no action to decline the offer. The amendments, however, expand the reach of the Rule to "all media," including continuity plans, automatic renewal plans and free trial to paid product conversion plans. The amended Rule takes specific aim at eliminating "undue burden" at cancellation by requiring sellers to make it as easy for consumers to cancel their enrollment as it was for them to sign up; for example, a consumer who signs up with a "click" must be able to cancel with a "click."

The amended rule does not prohibit negative options, but instead regulates their use by prohibiting four categories of conduct:

- misrepresenting any material fact made while marketing goods or services with a negative option feature;
- failing to clearly and conspicuously disclose material terms prior to obtaining a consumer's billing information in connection with a negative option feature;
- failing to obtain a consumer's express informed consent to the negative option feature before charging the consumer; and
- failing to provide a simple mechanism to cancel the negative option feature and immediately halt charges.

Based on public comment, the FTC opted not to include the following at this time:

- a requirement that sellers provide annual reminders to consumers of the negative option feature of their subscription; and

- an “upsell/save” prohibition, i.e., prohibiting sellers from telling consumers about plan modifications or reasons to keep to their existing agreement without first obtaining the consumers’ unambiguous assent to receive them.

The FTC, however, intends to revisit these provisions through a subsequent Notice of Proposed Rulemaking.

The amended Negative Option Rule fills out an existing federal statutory framework directed at various aspects of negative option marketing, including the Restore Online Shoppers’ Confidence Act (“ROSCA”), 15 U.S.C. 8401-8405, the Telemarketing Sales Rule (“TSR”), 16 CFR part 310, the Postal Reorganization Act (i.e., the Unordered Merchandise Statute), 39 U.S.C. 3009, and the Electronic Fund Transfer Act (“EFTA”), 15 U.S.C. 1693-1693r. The amended Negative Option Rule fills gaps in these statutes by establishing a specific set of marketing requirements and making them applicable across all four categories of negative option marketing.

The amended Rule will go into effect 180 days after publication in the federal register. Accordingly, businesses have a little time to review their cancellation practices and revise them if necessary.

Related People

Michele Floyd

t 415.273.4756

mfloyd@ktslaw.com

X. Diego Wu Min

t 858.350.6154

dwu@ktslaw.com